South American Diplomats Employed by the German Intelligence Services

Many South American diplomatic officials stationed in Berlin during the war were recruited there by members of the two principal German agencies concerned with foreign intelligence, the Security Service of the SS/SHA (HIMMELER's organization), and also the branch which purveyed intelligence to the Wehrmacht. The South Americans so recruited, when transferred to other capitals, worked as paid collaborators for one or the other of these German services.

(Sr.) Eduardo CEBALLOS, Argentine Naval Attaché at Madrid, was among others who worked for the German Security Service. His superiors were Karl ARNOLD, the Madrid chief of the Western Hemisphere section, and Reinhardt FRITZI, representative in Spain of the SS/ODA Works.

In Lisbon a diplomatic official referred to as MONTE was in German pay. The informant thought, but was not certain, that MONTE was a Chilean. (Note: Arturo ALVAREZ MONTENEGRO, First Secretary to the Argentine Legation at Lisbon, is known to have had contact with enemy agents, and may possibly be the person called MONTE by the Germans.)

In the Berlin headquarters of the Security Service, it was an officer named Kurt LROSS who dealt with the members of South American missions. The procedure employed to win them over was to encourage them in various ways to live beyond their means. Through a fashionable Berlin bar, the Security Service was provided with women who associated with the South Americans and induced them to spend money beyond what they could afford. Once in debt, the South American officials readily accepted financial considerations. All such officials enlisted by the Security Service did in fact receive money, for which, in return, they supplied the Security Service with intelligence reports.
